APPENDIX F

OUTLINES OF STATE SUPPLEMENTS

ALABAMA
OUTLINE

This supplement offers nuclear civil protection planners in Alabama a feasible method for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. It provides the basis for modifying the Alabama food support annex to include food distribution details which are consistent with regional food distribution patterns. The supplement is a component of a generalized approach to food redistribution applicable to all eight states in Federal Emergency Management Agency Region IV.

The supplement shows that most of the risk area conglomerates in Alabama are supplied by major food distributors in the warehouses located within the state. However, supermarkets in three of the conglomerates rely very heavily on food supplies from warehouses located in other states, like Georgia and Tennessee.

Following a general discussion of the leading food distributors serving supermarkets in the state and their location relative to risk area conglomerates, the supplement recommends a procedure for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. An actual reallocation for the risk area conglomerates is then produced by using this procedure. The supplement also assesses the stress that would be placed on retail outlets by the reallocation, and it then provides a method for determining transportation stress, as well as computing transportation stress factors for selected major distributors. Lastly, suggestions are offered on the organization, deployment, and procedures necessary to incorporate the information developed in the supplement into the current food support annex.

The supplement provides a regional perspective that is absent from the current Alabama annex; in other words, it expands the present scope of the annex. Furthermore, in that there seem to be no areas where the information contained in the supplement conflict with the basic principles of the annex, the supplement should be able to be incorporated without apparent difficulty.

A number of appendices containing the data essential to understanding the existing food distribution system and the data produced by using the recommended reallocation procedures have been published in a separate volume to the supplement.

FLORIDA

This supplement offers nuclear civil protection planners in Florida a feasible method for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. It provides the basis for modifying the Florida food support appendix to include food distribution details which are consistent with regional food distribution patterns. The supplement is a component of a generalized approach to food redistribution applicable to all eight states in Federal Emergency Management Agency Region IV.

The supplement shows that, with the exception of the Florida Panhandle, the almost 1500 supermarkets in Florida are served entirely or almost entirely by major food distributors with warehouses located within the state. On the other hand, many of the supermarkets in the Panhandle are quite dependent on food deliveries from warehouses located in Georgia, Alabama, and other states. Thus, a relatively heavy dependency on food deliveries from out-of-state sources exists in that part of Florida.

Following a general discussion of the leading food distributors serving supermarkets in the state and their location relative to risk area conglomerates, the supplement recommends a procedure for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. An actual reallocation for the risk area conglomerates is then produced by using this procedure. The supplement also assesses the stress that would be placed on retail outlets by the reallocation, and it then provides a method for determining transportation stress, as well as computing transportation stress factors for selected major distributors. Lastly, suggestions are offered on the organization, deployment, and procedures necessary to incorporate the information developed in the supplement into the current food support appendix.

The supplement provides a regional perspective that was for the most part only indirectly referred to in the current Florida food support appendix. However, incorporating the supplement into the appendix should be relatively simple in that many of the concepts and assumptions that are basic to the supplement originated in the process of preparing the current Florida appendix.

A number of appendices containing the data essential to understanding the existing food distribution system and the data produced by using the recommended reallocation procedures have been published in a separate volume to the supplement.

GEORGIA

This supplement offers nuclear civil protection planners in Georgia a feasible method for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. It provides the basis for modifying the Georgia food support appendix to include food distribution details which are consistent with regional food distribution patterns. The supplement is a component of a generalized approach to food redistribution applicable to all eight states in Federal Emergency Management Agency Region IV.

The supplement shows that twenty-seven percent of the supermarkets in Georgia are served by food distribution warehouses located in other states. This clearly indicates that there is a significant degree of dependency on food shipments from out-of-state sources. On the other hand, Georgia-based distributors, especially some of those in the Atlanta area, serve a considerable number of supermarkets in surrounding states. This situation emphasizes the interstate dependencies that exist in the present food supply system and upon which crisis relocation must rely.

Following a general discussion of the leading food distributors serving supermarkets in the state and their location relative to risk area conglomerates, the supplement recommends a procedure for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. An actual reallocation for the risk area conglomerates is then produced by using this procedure. The supplement also assesses the stress that would be placed on retail outlets by the reallocation, and it then provides a method for determining transportation stress, as well as computing transportation stress factors for selected major distributors. Lastly, suggestions are offered on the organization, deployment, and procedures necessary to incorporate the information developed in the supplement into the current food support appendix.

The current Georgia food support appendix partially sets the stage for continuing interstate food shipments during crisis relocation; however, it lacks sufficient identification of the existing system of food distribution and how the system can be redirected to satisfy the needs of crisis relocation. Incorporation of the data and information contained in this supplement could help to make the appendix more explicit in this regard.

KENTUCKY

This supplement offers nuclear civil protection planners in Kentucky a feasible method for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. It provides the basis for modifying the Kentucky food support appendix to include food distribution details which are consistent with regional food distribution patterns. The supplement is a component of a generalized approach to food redistribution applicable to all eight states in Federal Emergency Management Agency Region IV.

The supplement shows that, as far as food supply patterns are concerned, Kentucky has two of the least complex risk area conglomerates in the Southeast and two conglomerates which are among the most dependent on out-of-state food supply sources. Overall, almost thirty percent of the supermarkets in the state are served by warehouses located outside of the state. This indicates a fairly high degree of dependency on food shipments from out-of-state warehouses. Thus, a continuing supply of food to many Kentucky counties during crisis relocation will be highly dependent on the effectiveness of interstate coordination and planning for food support.

Following a general discussion of the leading food distributors serving supermarkets in the state and their locations relative to risk area conglomerates, the supplement recommends a procedure for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. An actual reallocation for the risk area conglomerates is then produced by using this procedure. The supplement also assesses the stress that would be placed on retail outlets by the reallocation, and it then provides a method for determining transportation stress, as well as computing transportation stress factors for selected major distributors. Lastly, suggestions are offered on the organization, deployment, and procedures necessary to incorporate the information developed in the supplement into the current food support appendix.

The current Kentucky food support appendix provides little emphasis on details for redistribution of food supplies. However, it does contain references which conform to the basic strategy of the redistribution concept proposed in this supplement. These references provide a foundation upon which the features of this supplement could be appended onto the current appendix. Furthermore, the data contained in the supplement could add considerable substance to the appendix in regard to the existing system of food distribution and to proposed patterns of redistribution for crisis relocation.

A number of appendices containing the data essential to understanding the existing food distribution system and the data produced by using the recommended reallocation procedures have been published in a separate volume to the supplement.

MISSISSIPPI

This supplement offers nuclear civil protection planners in Mississippi a feasible method for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. It provides the basis for modifying the Mississippi food support appendix to include food distribution details which are consistent with regional food distribution patterns. The supplement is a component of a generalized approach to food redistribution applicable to all eight states in Federal Emergency Management Agency Region IV.

The supplement shows that over half of the supermarkets in Mississippi are served by food distribution warehouses which are located in other states. In other words, risk area conglomerates in Mississippi are highly dependent on out-of-state sources for their food supplies. This predicament definitely demands a regional perspective when considering the reallocation of food supplies to accommodate crisis relocation.

Following a general discussion of the leading food distributors serving supermarkets in the state and their location relative to risk area conglomerates the supplement recommends a procedure for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. An actual reallocation for the risk area conglomerates is then produced by using this procedure. The supplement also assesses the stress that would be placed on retail outlets by the reallocation, and it then provides a method for determining transportation stress, as well as computing transportation stress factors for selected major distributors. Lastly, suggestions are offered on the organization, deployment, and procedures necessary to incorporate the information developed in the supplement into the current food support appendix.

The supplement points out that the Mississippi food support appendix should be amended to accommodate the heavy dependency of the state on food shipments from out-of-state warehouses. However, most of the suggested changes to the appendix are not really changes, but merely additions which would allow the appendix to adjust to the high degree of interstate food distribution dependency which currently exists. Failure to recognize and accommodate this interstate food dependency will result in a plan which could destine the state to a shortfall in food supply during a crisis relocation situation.

A number of appendices containing the data essential to understanding the existing food distribution system and the data produced by using the recommended reallocation procedures have been published in a separate volume to the supplement.

NORTH CAROLINA
OUTLINE

This supplement offers nuclear civil protection planners in North Carolina a feasible method for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. It provides the basis for modifying the North Carolina food support appendix to include food distribution details which are consistent with regional food distribution patterns. The supplement is a component of a generalized approach to food redistribution applicable to all eight states in Federal Emergency Management Agency Region IV.

The supplement shows that, for the most part, risk area conglomerates in North Carolina are supplied by major food distributors which are located within the state. In eleven of the thirteen conglomerates, ninety percent or more of the supermarkets are served by distributors having warehouses within the state. Only two of the conglomerates have a relatively significant degree of dependence on food supply from distributors located in other states.

Following a general discussion of the leading food distributors serving supermarkets in the state and their location relative to risk area conglomerates the supplement recommends a procedure for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. An actual reallocation for the risk area conglomerates is then produced by using this procedure. The supplement also assesses the stress that would be placed on retail outlets by the reallocation, and it then provides a method for determining transportation stress, as well as computing transportation stress factors for selected major distributors. Lastly, suggestions are offered on the organization, deployment, and procedures necessary to incorporate the information developed in the supplement into the current food support appendix.

The data and information contained in this supplement could add considerable substance to the North Carolina food support appendix regarding the existing system of food distribution and patterns of redistribution for crisis relocation.

A number of appendices containing the data essential to understanding the existing food distribution system and the data produced by using the recommended reallocation procedures have been published in a separate volume to the supplement.

SOUTH CAROLINA

This supplement offers nuclear civil protection planners in South Carolina a feasible method for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. It provides the basis for modifying the South Carolina food support annex to include food distribution details which are consistent with regional food distribution patterns. The supplement is a component of a generalized approach to food redistribution applicable to all eight states in Federal Emergency Management Agency Region IV.

The supplement shows that almost eighty percent of the supermarkets in South Carolina are served by major food distributors with warehouses located within the state. Since most of the out-of-state distributors which serve supermarkets in the state are located in North Carolina, it is with that state that close coordination and planning links are most essential.

Following a general discussion of the leading food distributors serving supermarkets in the state and their location relative to risk area conglomerates, the supplement recommends a procedure for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. An actual reallocation for the risk area conglomerates is then produced by using this procedure. The supplement also assesses the stress that would be placed on retail outlets by the reallocation, and it then provides a method for determining transportation stress, as well as computing transportation stress factors for selected major distributors. In addition, suggestions are offered on the organization, deployment, and procedures necessary to incorporate the information developed in the supplement into the current food support annex.

The information and data contained in this supplement fit very well with the assumptions and the concept stated in the South Carolina food support annex. However, the supplement creates an opportunity for expanding the scope of the annex by providing explicit information about the existing food system. Furthermore, it provides a fundamental methodology and the data necessary for developing detailed instructions for reallocation of food during crisis relocation.

A number of appendices containing the data essential to understanding the existing food distribution system and the data produced by using the recommended reallocation procedures have been published in a separate volume to the supplement.

TENNESSEE

This supplement offers nuclear civil protection planners in Tennessee a feasible method for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. It provides the basis for modifying the Tennessee food support annex to include food distribution details which are consistent with regional food distribution patterns. The supplement is a component of a generalized approach to food redistribution applicable to all eight states in Federal Emergency Management Agency Region IV.

The supplement shows that there are a relatively large number of major food distribution warehouses located in Tennessee, with many of them serving a considerable number of supermarkets in other states. Thus, a number of states have a high degree of dependency on Tennessee-based warehouses. Although Tennessee risk area conglomerates are not particularly dependent on shipments from out-of-state sources, the situation is made somewhat complex in that there are a relatively large number of warehouses involved. Twenty-eight out-of-state distributors (spread out over thirteen states) serve supermarkets in Tennessee risk area conglomerates.

Following a general discussion of the leading food distributors serving supermarkets in the state and their location relative to risk area conglomerates the supplement recommends a procedure for reallocating food distribution during crisis relocation. An actual reallocation for the risk area conglomerates is then produced by using this procedure. The supplement also assesses the stress that would be placed on retail outlets by the reallocation, and it then provides a method for determining transportation stress, as well as computing transportation stress factors for selected major distributors.

In addition, suggestions are offered on the organization, deployment, and procedures necessary to incorporate the information developed in the supplement into the current food support annex.

The supplement provides a regional perspective that was not contained in the current Tennessee food support annex; in other words, it presents an expanded concept to food redistribution. Incorporating the data and information from the supplement into the annex would not be difficult in that most of the basic features of the supplement appear to relate well with some of the fundamental strategies in the annex.

A number of appendices containing the data essential to understanding the existing food distribution system and the data produced by using the recommended reallocation procedures have been published in a separate volume to the supplement.
